The Modern Prospector

VERDICT—NOT GUILT

Dean & Co. of Chicago University, having taken a survey of three hundred of our leading students, has decided that the college atmosphere is not all "college." The conclusion does not surprise us, as it is not surprising that students should have considered it necessary to send an extensive questionnaire to the teachers about the college atmosphere. Perhaps this evidence was gathered for the benefit of the public at large.

The general public shows a useful lack of knowledge of college life. Their ignorance is not due to the students at our higher educational institutions, who often have to the best of their knowledge, and the publics' minds public opinion.

The result is a mistake; a mistake in the understanding of the students at our higher educational institutions, who often have to the best of their knowledge, and the publics' minds public opinion.

They gave the express rider a good start

Henry Wells, developing the mail and express business of Wells Fargo, knew the necessity of careful preparation and expert management. Communication was more than the picturesque ranging of pony express riders; behind the scenes there were the intricate plans of routes, the unvarnished inspection of apparatus and men.

Communication today is incomparably better than it was then, thanks to electricity. And to a vastly greater degree has the work of preparation behind the scenes become important. In the Bell System, management must constantly look ahead to provide the service of service against growing public demand—material and human must be mobilized to extend and keep open the lines of communication.
