Selective Service Folly

The recent changes in Selective Service rulings reveal an almost incredible lack of foresight on the part of the United States and its allies. When this war began, our country was woefully short of many things. Most of those shortages have now been eliminated, and our production lines turn out vast quantities of war matériel. Yet, there is one vital commodity, essential to the conduct of modern war, of which America still does not have a ready supply. We are forced to train engineers and scientists.

Now, many technical training programs which have set up have turned up many engineers who are being used to fill the posts of engineers. The results of this have not always been helpful to the war effort, and the huge mass of materials, machinery, and time, and consequence, the loss of many engineers has increased. In the months of February, March, and April, the companies in that country scrapped 100% of its castings. And yet the research men who were working on ways and means of making new designs have not been utilized.

Perhaps they can do their country more good using a gun or swabbing decks, but it seems doubtful.
